"SMS is too Hard"

Safety Management Systems (SMS) are often perceived as daunting or as an additional burden. However, it's crucial to understand that SMS is more than just a computerized system—it's a fusion of people, processes, and technology working together to mitigate risks and ensure organizational safety.

People constitute the backbone of safety within any organization. They require supportive leadership, adequate training, and continuous awareness of the latest safety protocols to effectively contribute to safe operations.

Processes should be tailored to fit the specific needs of the organization, ensuring that safety measures are appropriately integrated while maintaining the necessary level of managerial oversight. Lean, goal-oriented processes are essential, with clear communication of why certain procedures are in place.

Technology can significantly enhance SMS implementation by simplifying processes and seamlessly integrating safety practices into daily operations. While SMS can theoretically be managed with minimal technology, leveraging the right tools can streamline workflows and improve overall efficiency.

As regulatory requirements for SMS implementation, such as the FAA Mandate for 135 operators, become imminent, it's a prime opportunity for aviation operators to reassess their SMS strategies. Polaris Aero offers valuable assistance in developing and managing effective safety programs.

In general, no compensation is permitted if an aircraft is being operated under Part 91. If the operator of the aircraft receives compensation for the flight, then the operator must be an FAA air carrier or commercial operator and operate the flight under Part 135.
